

TALANOA

EXPLORE THE INTERSECTION BETWEEN
ECOLOGY AND TECHNOLOGY

A complete, off-grid infrastructure for community driven agriculture.

The need to provide a sustainable food supply both domestically and globally is significant and riddled with challenges. From dwindling natural resources, to a lack of infrastructure that can support reliable crop growth, there is a need to provide communities with the tools to grow their own food locally and earn a livelihood.

In response, Farm from a Box has developed a comprehensive solution that acts as the "Swiss-Army knife" of sustainable farming; a single, deliverable unit that contains all of the core components needed for a 2-acre farm. Powered by renewable energy, Farm from a Box is ideal for any application that requires a comprehensive system that enables sustained local food production, without need for an existing grid. Farm from a Box is a benefit corporation that is using a market-based approach to bring struggling communities the farming capabilities that they need to grow their own food and generate an income.

They work to create an enabling mechanism to increase yields and extend growing season, by building regenerative sustainable production systems, provide access to power and clean water, bridge the technology "access gap" and improve, contribute to local economies as well as build community resilience to challenges and to foster greater gender equity and empowerment. We invite you to attend this introductory Talanoa to explore the intersection between ecology and technology in the form of a company that has developed a complete off-grid toolkit for operating a farm anywhere there is land and some water and as a technological innovation for agriculture and energy from the biodiversity and climate angles.
